

Eyes on the road: the state of eye based measures in traffic research.

Eye based measures such as gaze tracking, blink rates and blink duration, have an important role in traffic safety research and in applied cognitive psychology as a whole. While eye-tracking systems have been used for quite some time already, rapid technological developments both in hardware and software are extending the functionality and applicability of such devices. Here we briefly discuss and compare the current state of various capturing systems.